Attitudes may be part of a set of beliefs shared within a cultural group and founded in common experiences, and they often direct the transformation of knowledge into practice. Throughout its deliberations, the committee considered several questions relevant to its charge: What knowledge and attitudes do parents of young children bring to the task of parenting? Many of our food and body image issues start as children, and often because of it. At the same time, however, children with immigrant parents are more likely than children in native-born families to grow up poor Hernandez et al. Indeed, many young immigrant children display health and learning outcomes better than those of children of native-born parents in similar socioeconomic
