It is therefore an excellent read for the reader, the researcher or the interested person an opportunity to compare and contrast the actual experience with other sources of information. Presented February 18, to Boeing Connectivism & Connected Knowledge via Elluminate. Part of this thinking is centered around the theory of connectivism, which asserts that knowledge - and therefore the learning of knowledge - is distributive, that is, not located in any given place and therefore not 'transferred' or 'transacted' per se but rather consists of the network of connections formed from experience and interactions with a knowing community.

The course was repeated in and in Baker Publishing Company Follow. Every day, the facilitators published a newsletter aggregating many of these sources, e.
