On the individual level, higher levels of education do result in higher levels of sustained engagement and a higher probability that someone who stops participating at one point in life will become re-involved at later stages. This of course makes sense, because the study is about life trajectories and not just participation. Snow, University of California, Irvine. Rather than focusing on the correlates of initial engagement, as most movement participation studies have done, Corrigan-Brown takes us on a journey, based on life history interviews with participants in four different movements, that elaborates the various degrees and trajectories of participation in a more thorough and nuanced fashion than has been done heretofore.
